The European Convention on Human Rights is an international treaty drawn up to protect human rights and fundamental freedoms, including the right to life, freedom of speech, and the right to a fair trial. The treaty was adopted by the Council of Europe in 1950 and has been ratified by 47 states, including the United Kingdom.

When a case is brought under the Convention, the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) may determine whether the rights of an individual have been violated. The ECtHR has jurisdiction to hear cases brought by individuals against States that are parties to the Convention or to hear cases between States.

The UK has accepted the jurisdiction of the ECtHR under the Human Rights Act 1998, which incorporates the Convention into UK law. This means that individuals in the UK can bring cases to the Court against the UK government if they believe their rights have been violated. The impact of cases brought under the Human Rights Act has been significant, leading to changes in legislation and policy to ensure compliance with human rights standards.
