The Yellow Sign is a short story by American writer Robert W. Chambers, first published in 1917. It is one of the most famous stories in the genre of weird fiction, and is considered by many to be the first work of H.P. Lovecraft's Cthulhu Mythos.

The story begins with a group of friends, the Ch thoughtful men, who are wandering through the English countryside. They come across an old house, and decide to investigate it. As they explore the house, they begin to experience strange and terrifying events.

One of the most notable aspects of The Yellow Sign is its use of atmosphere and setting. The house is described as being old and crumbling, with a dark and foreboding feel to it. The surrounding countryside is also described as being eerie and unsettling.

Another important element of the story is the use of supernatural entities. The house is inhabited by a malevolent supernatural entity known as the King in Yellow, who haunts the surrounding area and causes all manner of terror and destruction.

The Yellow Sign is a classic example of weird fiction, a genre that is characterized by its focus on the supernatural and the unexplainable. It is a story that is both terrifying and unsettling, and has become a classic of the genre.
